While these medicines are safe, there are concerns that switching between different brands may pose risks, and doctors say it should only be done strictly under medical supervision. The Government stands to save $880 million if it can shift patients onto the cheaper drugs, which are similar but not exactly the same, allowing other breakthrough medicines to be funded. It wants to speed up that shift and this week changed legislation to allow a chemist to switch the medicine when a patient presents a script, in the same way they can substitute cheaper generic drugs. Before chemists can make the switch, the Pharmaceutical Benefits Advisory Committee must decide if it is safe to do so. However in making that decision, the PBAC says it will have a default position of allowing substitution and consider any absence of data about safety issues or efficacy problems with the drugs as relevant issues. "This shift in the burden of proof is concerning
